The Inspiration

The inspiration for the collection came from the work of German photographer Helmut Newton. Newton was known for his provocative images of women, and his work often explored themes of sexuality and power. The Building the Body team was inspired by Newton's aesthetic, and they sought to create a collection that would be both alluring and empowering.

The Collection

The collection featured a variety of different pieces, including dresses, skirts, tops, and bodysuits. The pieces were made from a range of fabrics, including silk, lace, and leather. The collection was dominated by black and white, but there were also a few pieces in bold colors, such as red and blue.

One of the standout pieces from the collection was a black dress with a plunging neckline and a high slit. The dress was made of a sheer fabric that revealed the model's body underneath. The dress was both alluring and empowering, and it was sure to turn heads.

Another popular piece from the collection was a white lace bodysuit. The bodysuit was made of a delicate lace fabric that revealed the model's skin underneath. The bodysuit was both sexy and sophisticated, and it could be worn with a variety of different pieces.

The Impact

The 2008 Autumn/Winter collection from Building the Body was a huge success. The collection was praised by critics for its daring and innovative designs. The collection was also a commercial success, and it helped to establish Building the Body as one of the leading fashion brands in the world.
